Future opportunities:

Psychology is a science and can be combined with most other subjects, including arts and science subjects. Psychology can lead to specific careers in Industrial, Clinical, Educational or Forensic Psychology, counselling and therapy, but it is also a useful qualification to have if you are thinking of any career that involves dealing with people. An understanding of psychological procedures and principles would also be useful in careers such as teaching, health service related occupations, law (including police) and social work. The subject of Psychology is highly recognised by H.E. Institutions and offers the opportunity to study at degree level.

Further information:

A keen interest in human behaviour is desirable when considering the uptake of this subject. Students should also have excellent communication skills and achieve at least a 6 in Additional Science or Biology. Psychology A-Level requires a lot of independent reading and research so students will need to be focused and well organised in managing their time.
